Temples in Ancient Egypt

Egyptian temples were sacred places where priests worshiped the gods. A temple could be home to one or more deities who were believed to live within statues housed in a shrine. Temples contained libraries of important ritual texts and were also important economic centres.

Some key features of a temple were:

Hypostyle hall: a roofed space filled with columns, often in the shape of papyrus plants.

Open court: a roofless courtyard, also called the 'festival court'.

Pylon: a monumental gateway, originally with flagpoles outside.

Sanctuary: where the god's statue was kept in its shrine.
